What are the energy sources in Zimbabwe?

Zimbabwe's energy sources are a mix of hydropower (70%), coal (29%) and renewables (1%). The country's major hydropower station is the Kariba South hydroelectric power station. The country also has four thermal power stations in Bulawayo, Harare, Hwange and Munyati.

Why should Zimbabwe expand the rural electrification programme?

The continuing reduction in costs and Zimbabwe's ideal environment for solar energy production is an opportunity to expand the rural electrification programme. This will be an important step in fulfilling both the NDS 1 vision of access to modern energy by targeting the larger part of the populace.

Does Zimbabwe have a good power supply?

The Zimbabwe Electricity Transmission and Distribution Company (ZETDC), although facing challenges, registered improved power supplies this month (June 2023). Citizens in various parts of the country acknowledged a reduction in blackouts, with some citing an "unusual" experience of at least a week of consecutive days of power supply.

Does Zimbabwe have more electricity than Kenya?

Access to electricity in Zimbabwe has grown only slightly from 32.3% of the population in 2014 to 52.75% in 2020, according to the World Bank. By contrast, Kenyans' access to electricity has grown from 36% to 71% over the same time.

Is there a rural-urban electricity access divide in Zimbabwe?

There is also a huge rural-urban electricity access divide in Zimbabwe, with only 37% of the rural population having access to electricity by 2020. This figure has probably deteriorated since then. As part of its commitment to bridge this divide, the post-independence government embarked on the Rural Electrification Programme (REP) in 1983.
