Why is the United States a major donor to Tanzania?

The United States is Tanzania's largest bilateral donor, and for 60 plus years has provided development and other assistance to Tanzania for capacity-building to address health and education issues, encourage democratic governance, promote broad-based economic growth, and advance regional and domestic security to sustain progress.

What does the United States do in Tanzania?

The United States remains committed to strengthening democracy in Tanzania and working with Tanzanians on women's and children's health, HIV/AIDS, nutrition and food security, inclusive economic growth, wildlife conservation, sustainable development, and security.

Why did the United States and Tanzania have a good relationship?

These interests were often in conflict between 1961, and the late 1980s. Since the late 1980s, relations between the United States and Tanzania have improved as a result of mutual interests in debt relief, successive refugee crises, the liberation of southern African countries, and an improving Tanzanian economy (see Waters 2006).

What products does Tanzania export to the United States?

Agricultural commodities, minerals, and textiles dominate Tanzania's exports to the United States while imports from the United States include aircraft, machinery, cereals, plastics, and milling products. Tanzania receives preferential trade benefits under the African Growth and Opportunity Act.

What programs welcome Tanzanians to the United States?

Several exchange programs welcome Tanzanians to the United States, including through the Fulbright Program, Hubert Humphrey Fellowship, and Young African Leaders Initiative, among others.
