The C'Tan are deposed, and sealed in stasis, within Tesseract Vaults, so they don't need food. The Necrons are machines, so they don't eat, and while they happily murder other life, even disintegrating it, nothing they do seems to hint, to me, they're "absorbing" anything from it. Their structures use external energy sources, as well. I get, to ...

You could add Iron breaker over it to brighten the metal if you like. I also strongly recommend a drybrush of Necron Compound: it's like polishing in a pot, really brings out a shine to them. For the black parts, Citadel offers 2 paints: ...

Necron technology is extraordinarily advanced by human standards, with devastatingly powerful weapons backed up by resilient vehicles and trans-dimensional teleportation. Most shockingly of all, seemingly destroyed Necrons can self-repair, their damaged bodies reknitting and standing back up after even the most devastating salvo.

I've seen so many nons in m5 running around with 9* necron using fine gems which is not fine at all imo

Then GW took Necron lore/themes in a slightly different direction, and Pariahs were kind of replaced by Lychguard and Triarch Praetorians (as elite infantry, minus the anti-soul stuff). As for Necrons being soulless, it's quite different to human pariahs. Necrons just don't have a soul, where a pariah has a kind of negative-soul.
